In New Zealand, Charged for Having a Baofeng Radio

From QRZ:

On 24 of August 2018 Mr Elvis Johnstone was stopped by Police in the Whangarei area. On search of Mr Johnstone's car, police located a Baofeng UV-5R two way radio. When switched on the device was set to the same frequency as the Northland Police channel.

Last update: 2020/08/07 13:03

Charges were laid by Radio Spectrum Management (RSM) under sections 113 and 114 of the Radiocommunications Act 1989. Judge Harding imposed a fine of \$3000, discounted by 25% for early guilty plea resulting in a fine of \$2250 plus court costs.

Here, it's completely legal to listen to radio frequencies. Transmitting is a different matter. But what about listening with a radio that could potentially transmit?